

Blogger's Toolkit: Evaluating LIS Weblogs

Use Librarian's Tools:

This is similar to evaluating sites for reference and inclusion on subject list. Questions to ponder when adding blogs to your aggregator or recommending them to colleagues:

- Author: Who is the blog author? Is that information easily accessible? Where do they work?
- Purpose: What's the mission or goal of the blog? Is it stated? Is it a commercial venture masquerading as an informative site?
- Currency: How often are posts made? When was the last one?
- Objectivity: Is there a bias present?
- Depth: What's the scope or level of substance? Are the posts essays? Links to other blogs that might be better?

Laurel Clyde, Weblogs & Libraries 2004:

Clyde addresses similar criteria as above and includes Web specific concerns:

- Does the blog have an appropriate format?
- Is it well organized?
- How attractive are the pages? The front page? The archives?
- Is it easy to navigate? Can you find your way back to the top page easily?
- Does it work in all browsers on all platforms?
- Has it been usability tested? Does it meet accessibility guidelines such as section 508?
- Do the links work and do they seem relevant?

- Is the order of postings useful? (Reverse chronological? Chronological? By subject?)
- Is there a method of interacting with the author? Comments? E-Mail? IM?
- Is there an RSS feed and is it easy to find? Does it work?

Utilize a LIS Weblog Directory:

Use these directories of LIS Weblogs to locate useful library and librarian's weblogs.

- Library Weblogs (<http://www.libdex.com/weblogs.html>) - Peter Scott's directory of LIS Weblogs
- blogwithoutalibrary.net (<http://www.blogwithoutalibrary.net/links.html>) - LIS Weblog author Amanda Etches-Johnson's list of LIS Weblogs
- The Internet Courses: Weblogs (<http://www.hi.is/~anne/weblogs.html>) - Dr. Laurel Clyde's directory related to her work with LIS Weblogs
